In 1976 a papyrus of Stesichorus was published at Lille, containing part of a previously unknown poem about the myth of Polynices and Eteocles.\footnote{Meillier (1976).} The text in question is quite long – almost 130 lines – and a stichometric numeral in the margin allows us to identify that lines 176 to 303 of the poem are preserved. Lines 176 to 200 are highly fragmentary, but from line 201 much of the text is basically complete. That complete portion begins with a speech from the mother of Oedipus’ sons, begging them to put aside fratricidal strife and thus avoid Tiresias’ prophecy of doom – this prophecy was evidently delivered shortly before the fragment begins. Her sons agree to do so, and cast lots to decide who is to take the kingdom, and who Oedipus’ possessions. The lot decides that Eteocles is to have the kingdom,\footnote{For this incident see Finglass (2013a).} and Polynices gathers the possessions that he is owed, and departs – but not before Tiresias delivers a further, highly fragmentary, speech, which prophesies Polynices’ arrival in Argos and wedding to Adrastus’ daughter. The fragment breaks off after a description of Polynices’ journey, leaving him stranded at Cleonai on the fringes of the Argolid – at least until some future papyrus find allows him to continue on his way.

The first edition of the fragment, in 1976, was flawed; the outstanding reedition of the papyrus in the following year by Peter Parsons has been the

---

This paper was delivered at a conference on Silver Latin epic held at the University of Nottingham in September 2016; I am grateful to Professor Helen Lovatt for the invitation to speak, and to Ariadne’s helpful referee.
foundation for all subsequent work. Parsons’s reedition is accompanied by a commentary which seeks not just to recover Stesichorus’ text, but to situate it within Greek and Latin literature. And it was he who pointed out that the journey which concludes our fragment parallels the trip taken by Polynices in Statius’ Thebaid. Let us first examine the Stesichorean journey:

> òc φάτ[ο Τειρεσίας ὅ]γυμάκλυτος, αἵσα δ’ α[—— > δόμω,[——
> οἰχετ[——], το φίλωι Πολυνείκει [———
> Θηβαί,[———

----------

295  ... om. [——] ὑ εἴκειν μέγα τείχ[ος ὅ— —
.....[——]... αὐτῶι
.....[———] πποίς τ’ ἰκαν ἀκρο[ν — —
ἀνδρε[———

πομπι [———] δ’ ἱκοντο 1εμόν

300  ποντίο [———
κραί,[———] νχαιε

----------

αὐτά[ρ ——] ἀστεα καλὰ Κορίνθου
ρίμφα δ’ [ἐυκτίμινας] Κλεωνάκ ἱμθον

293 ᾧπογντο Page 295 ἐρχομεν...ἀμείψας Parsons 296 ὑμεν vel ], ἔπι Parsons 297 πολλα[ὶς ἀμύνοις] δ’ ἱπποῖς 300 πόντιον [ἀμφίσωλ Parsons: ποντίου] ἔννοιδα West

3 Parsons (1977). For an account of work subsequent to Parsons see Finglass (2014c); for Stesichorus’ narrative technique in the poem see Finglass (2015) 87–92.
Thus spoke Tiresias of the famous name, and immediately . . . the palace . . . he left . . .
. for dear Polynices . . . Thebes . . . travelling along the road he went on his way, crossing over the great wall . . . with many mules and horses they came to the tip [of]
. . . men . . . they came to the Isthmus . . . fine cities of Corinth, and swiftly arrived at well founded Cleonae . . .

Stes. fr. 97.294–303 F.¹

Here is the corresponding passage in Statius:⁵

\[
\begin{align*}
t & = \text{tunc sedet Inachias urbes Danaëiaque arva} \\
325 & = \text{et caligantes ab rupto sole Mycenas} \\
& = \text{ferre iter impavidum, seu praevia ducit Erinys,} \\
& = \text{seu fors illa viae, sive hac immota vocabat} \\
& = \text{Atropos. Ogygiis ululata furoribus antra} \\
& = \text{deserit et pingues Baccheo sanguine colles.} \\
330 & = \text{inde plagam, qua molle sedens in plana Cithaeron} \\
& = \text{porrigitur lassumque inclinat ad aequora montem,} \\
& = \text{praeterit. hinc arte scopulo so in limite pendens} \\
& = \text{infames Sciron petras Scyllaeaque rura} \\
& = \text{purpureo regnata seni mitemque Corinthon} \\
335 & = \text{linquit et in mediis audit duo litora campis.}
\end{align*}
\]

¹ Fragments of Stesichorus are cited from Finglass (2014b).

⁵ Translation from Shackleton Bailey (2003).
Then he decides to take his way boldly to the cities of Inachus and Danaë’s fields and Mycenae darkened with sun cut short. Does a guiding Fury lead him on, or is it the chance of the road, or was inexorable Atropos summoning him that way? He leaves the glades where Ogygian madness howls and hills fat with Bacchic gore. Thence he passes the tract where Cithaeron stretches out, gently sinking into the flat, and inclines his weary steep to the sea. From here the rocky path is high and narrow. He leaves Sciron’s ill-famed cliffs and Scylla’s fields where the purple ancient ruled and gentle⁶ Corinth; and in mid land he hears two shores.

So in Stesichorus, lines 294–8 will describe Polynices’ journey from Thebes until he reaches the Isthmus (299), followed by Corinth (302), and Cleonae (303) near Argos. Statius’ Polynices travels from Thebes (328–9), past Cithaeron (330–2) and the Isthmus via Megara (332–4), to Corinth (334–5); the next geographical reference puts him near Lerna in the Argolid (380–9).⁷

Nobody to my knowledge has made anything of the parallel drawn by Parsons. Yet if the archaic Greek epic Thebaid had survived, and contained a passage like what we find in Stesichorus, and if the passage occurred almost exactly the same distance into that poem as Statius’ passage does into his, then scholars would certainly be making something of it, noting how, in Parsons’s words (pp. 33–4), ‘Statius . . . describes the same journey [as Stesichorus], though in more melodramatic circumstances’; how he takes the relatively plain Stesichorean narrative and turns it into something much more colourful, with its Erinyes and references to mythological events, including great sinners such as Pentheus (by implication), Sciron, and Scylla (two of whom were themselves involved in terrible intrafamilial conflicts), emphasising the fateful nature of the journey which will ultimately lead to such great bloodshed. Statius has his Polynices encounter a storm on the way, which substantially delays the narrative. Stesichorus, on the other hand, brings him to Cleonae, at least, with much greater dispatch. It seems unlikely that the poet substantially delayed the warrior’s arrival at Argos, and if that is correct then Statius’ dramatic storm – one of only a couple of Statian passages which Shackleton Bailey says ‘once read are not forgotten’⁸ – comes as more of a surprise to anyone familiar with the Stesichorean narrative. Just because the parallel is not with an epic text but with a lyric text – albeit a lyric text with a particular connexion to epic⁹ – we should not automatically discount or ignore the possibility that Statius did indeed known Stesichorus’ passage, and that some of Statius’ audience had the Stesichorean passage as part of their mental furniture as they read the Roman poet’s verse.

⁶ Or ‘wealthy’, if we emend transmitted mitem to ditem.

⁷ For the route from Corinth to Argos in antiquity see Marchand (2009), especially the map on p. 110 showing how Cleonae was on the way.

Nor is this the only similarity between Statius’ and Stesichorus’ accounts of the build-up to the war of the Seven. As Parsons points out, the use of the lot is attested in both these poets,¹⁰ although in Statius it determines which brother is to rule first, in Stesichorus which is to have the kingdom and which Oedipus’ possessions. Other ancient writers give different versions: so in Pherecydes and Sophocles, Eteocles drives Polynices out by force; in Hellanicus, the brothers agree that Eteocles should get the kingdom, while Polynices takes the property and goes into exile; and in Euripides, Eteocles rules first because he is the elder, but agrees to cede power to

---

⁹ See West (2015).
¹⁰ Parsons (1977) 20–1; so also Marinis (2015) 354 n. 63.
Polynices after a year, and subsequently the pair are to rule in alternative years. The imagery of the lot is prominent in Aeschylus’ Seven against Thebes, and Laura Swift has recently argued that this is because of Stesichorean influence; it would be bold indeed to say that the same influence could not have worked on Statius too, especially since the close juxtaposition of lot and journey is found in both.

The use of the lot in Stesichorus is suggested by the mother of Polynices and Eteocles, as a means of heading off the dire prophecy just uttered by Tiresias; Statius’ poem, by contrast, has Tisiphone, prompted by Oedipus’ curse, arise from the underworld to stimulate the brothers into dividing their inheritance in the same way. The Queen’s impassioned desire in Stesichorus’ poem to avoid Tiresias’ prophecy suggests that a curse by Oedipus is not at issue, because she would scarcely have neglected to mention it. So when Ganiban remarks that Sophocles’ Oedipus at Colonus is ‘the only Greek version in which [Oedipus’] curse does not give birth to the expedition’, he has forgotten Stesichorus. The efforts of Stesichorus’ Queen to head off the conflict are to an extent paralleled by those of Statius’ Jocasta, although hers occur at a later stage in the poem; who knows what connexions we could find if we had more of Stesichorus’ work.

---

14 Stat. Theb. 11.315–53. See McNelis (2007) 147 with n. 77, Augoustakis (2010) 62–8, Simms (2014), and Voigt (2015); Stesichorus is compared by Augoustakis (p. 62 n. 68) and by Simms (‘Quite likely Jocasta’s attempts to forestall or deter the mutual fratricide of her sons does not so much depart from the tradition of Homer and Sophocles as return to an innovation explored by Stesichorus’, p. 172), but not by McNelis or by Voigt, even though her article appears in a journal itself published in Lille. Voigt’s account of scenes in literature where a mother intervenes ahead of a conflict (pp. 11–12) ought
We must be careful, in the course of our investigations, not to assume too much about Stesichorus’ Queen. A recent author in the monumental Brill’s Companion to Statius remarks that ‘Jocasta’s role in the battle between her sons goes back to Stesichorus but is best examined in the tragedies of Euripides and Seneca. The differences between the Greek and Latin Phoenissae as well as Statius’ treatment are well attested in the scholarship . . .’16 Here, alas, the promising focus on Stesichorus proves all too short; moreover, there is an implied, groundless, assumption that Stesichorus’ Queen is called Jocasta. This assumption recurs in Smolenaars’s discussion of whether Statius depicts Jocasta as dead or alive at Thebaid 1.72: ‘Jocasta’s attempt, absent in Aeschylus’ Septem, first occurs – as far as we can tell – in the Lille papyrus discovered in 1976 (P.Lille 76; fr. 222b PMGF). This lyric version of the Oedipus legend is ascribed by most scholars to Stesichorus (640–555).17 The fragment contains a dialogue between the seer Teiresias, who foretells the fratricide, and Jocasta, who wants to prevent it. In any case, this storyline presupposes that Jocasta, unlike in Homer and OT, lives on after the anagnorisis and after Oedipus’ self-blinding. This drastic change in the treatment of the Theban legend is 15 So as Augoustakis (2016) xviii n. 8 suggests, with reference to Tydeus’ cannibalism during the conflict before the city, ‘Stesichorus’ version of the Theban cycle may have included the cannibalism scene, since PMGF 222b possibly narrated the saga up to the fratricide . . ., and at least up to Polynices’ journey to Argos’.

---

17 For the date of Stesichorus’ poetic activity, which I would place somewhere between 610 and 540, see Finglass (2014a) 1–6. Smolenaars’s phrase ‘by most scholars’ is unhelpful; if he knows scholars who do not believe that the fragment is by Stesichorus (and I know of none), he should name them.
first staged by Euripides in his Phoinissai, and later also by Seneca in his Phoenissae.\(^ {18}\) But we are not told the name of the Queen in what survives of Stesichorus’ text. Long before Sophocles’ play became the canonical telling of the myth, forever associating Oedipus with Jocasta, the Theban king was associated with several different women – Epicaste, Euryganeia, Eurycleia, Astymedusa. Stesichorus’ Queen might have had any of these names, or another one entirely. More importantly than the name, there is no evidence for Oedipus producing children with his mother until Pherecydes in the fifth century, and no evidence for the survival of Oedipus’ mother after the discovery of her incest before Euripides.\(^ {19}\) It is not impossible that both these features are Stesichorean, but that is unlikely; certainly, such a position has to be argued for, not merely asserted as if the mother of Oedipus’ children is always Oedipus’ own mother. This is likely to have been an area where Stesichorus’ treatment of the myth was quite different from what we find in Statius.

Could Statius have read Stesichorus? Had he even heard of him? The answer to both questions is ‘yes’. The last person who we can say for sure was familiar with his poetry was Athenaeus in the late second or early third century, so well after Statius’ time.\(^ {20}\) And of the eight papyri that we possess, one (the Lille papyrus, from the Fayum) is Ptolemaic, while the other seven, all from Oxyrhynchus, include four from the first century, two from the second, and one from the second or third.\(^ {21}\) If Stesichorus was so accessible in such an unremarkable town in Egypt, readers at

---

\(^ {18}\) Smolenaars (2008) 222. It is possible, however, that Jocasta lived on after Oedipus’ blinding in Euripides’ Oedipus too; on this play, which may predate Phoenician Women, see Finglass (2017a), which cites earlier literature. (I should have pointed this out at Finglass (2014c) 365.)

\(^ {19}\) Pher. fr. 95 EGM. See Finglass (2014c) 364–6, Finglass (2017b) Introduction section §3.

\(^ {20}\) See Finglass and Kelly (2015a) 1.

\(^ {21}\) For an account of the papyri see Finglass (2014a) 73–6.
Rome will have had no trouble getting hold of his works. The Tabula Iliaca Capitolina, a calcite tablet sculpted shortly before the turn of the eras, and discovered ten miles to the south-east of Rome, proclaims that it depicts ‘the Sack of Troy according to Stesichorus’, and accompanies that claim with a pretty elegiac couplet alluding to the language of the opening of that very poem. This suggests interest in and familiarity with Stesichorus on the part of its maker and intended viewers, in a period shortly before Statius’ lifetime.\(^{22}\)

Moreover, Statius refers directly to Stesichorus in the Silvae, in a list of Greek poets mostly from the archaic period that his father taught at his school in Naples:\(^{23}\)

```
hinc tibi uota patrum credi generosaque pubes
te monitore regi, mores et facta priorum discere, quis casus Troiae, quam tardus Vlixes, quantus equum pugnasque uirum decurrere uersu
Maemonides quantumque pios ditarit agrestes
Ascræus Siculusque senex, qua lege recurrat
Pindaricae uox flexa lyrae volucrumque precator
Ibycus et tetricis Alcman cantatus Amyclis

Stesichorusque ferox saltusque ingressa uiriles non formidata temeraria Chalcide Sappho, quosque alios dignata chelys. tu pandere docti

```

Sophronaque implicitum tenuisque arcana Corinnae.

Stat. Silv. 5.3.146–58 = Stes. test. Tb50 Ercoles

Hence parents’ hopes were entrusted to you and noble youth governed by your guidance, as they learned the manners and deeds of men gone by: the fate of Troy, Ulysses’ tardiness, Maeonides’ power to pass in verse through heroes’ horses and combats, what riches the old man of Ascra and the old man of Sicily gave honest farmers, what law governs the recurring voice of Pindar’s winding harp, and Ibycus, who prayed to birds, and Aleman, sung in austere Amyclae, and bold Stesichorus and rash Sappho, who feared not Leucas but took the manly leap, and others by the lyre approved. You were skilled to expound the songs of Battus’ son, the lurking places of dark Lycophron, Sophron’s mazes, and the secrets of subtle Corinna.

Among these brief vignettes of Greek poets from the archaic to the Hellenistic periods Statius refers to Stesichorus ferox, ‘Stesichorus the fierce’, and we may wonder exactly what that means. Other ancient criticism of Stesichorus tended to refer to his Homeric nature, or to his sweetness, as explored in a recent paper by Richard Hunter; Statius’ use of this term deserves comment. And comment it finds, in the detailed commentary on the testimonia to Stesichorus published by Marco Ercoles in 2013. He notes that the only other poet who receives this epithet from Statius is Ennius, when he says cedet Musa rudis ferocis Enni ‘Let the rough Muse of ferocious Enni give way’ (Silv. 2.775), an expression which, according to Newlands,

---

'assimilates the epic poet to the military hero in spirited style'. Quintilian’s famous description of Stesichorus as maxima bella et clarissimos canentem duces et epici carminis onera lyra sustinentem ‘singing of great wars and famous leaders and sustaining on his lyre the weight of epic song’ associates him too with wars and battles; Statius’ description of him as ferox seems to point in the same direction. If so, it may be a clue that Statius did indeed know Stesichorus’ poem, since specifically military accounts are not prominent among his surviving poetry; only the Sack of Troy would count, and even that begins in a surprisingly unmilitaristic fashion.

No doubt there is more to be said on the association of these two poets, both of which have languished for too long in the shadow of slightly earlier, more famous poets whose work they transformed in innovative ways; but Statian scholars are more likely than I to be able to say it. Stesichorus and all the rich poetry of the archaic period, so often still neglected simply because it is fragmentary, continues to offer students of Latin literature great opportunities to discover intriguing poetic connexions between texts centuries apart.

Works cited

---

26 Newlands (2011) 241; she additionally notes that only Statius uses ferox to describe a poet.

28 See Finglass (2013b).

Finglass, P. J. (2017b) Sophocles. Oedipus the King (Cambridge Classical Texts and Commentaries; Cambridge).

